

FIVE SCRIPTS. HER REGISTER.

The outfit photo changes the brief more than any note so far. Written for the woman in that picture — not for the one I had been imagining.

WHAT THE PHOTO TOLD ME

Beige co-ord, cropped bolero, thigh-slit column skirt, chunky black boots, travertine hotel corridor, low moody light, mirror selfie. That is a fashion register — dry, cool, understated. Every concept I sent yesterday was built on broad desi comedy: three aunties in dupattas, a mock courtroom, a wrist being grabbed at a wedding. On this creator they would have looked borrowed. These five are written in the voice of the person actually in the picture.

Hero Bold Nocturne Bracelet ₹1,999 — chunky gold against beige and black is the strongest pairing in the catalogue

Second Charm Box Chain ₹2,149

WHAT THE OUTFIT CHANGES.

One photograph killed six concepts, and it should have.

The register is wrong in everything I sent. The Bracelet Committee, the aunty grabbing a wrist, the mock courtroom with a wooden spoon — those are written for a creator whose whole act is playing Indian family archetypes. This creator's act is taste. Put her in a dupatta doing a saas-bahu bit and it reads as a brand handing a script to someone it doesn't watch.

But the photo also hands me three gifts.

1. A place, and a very specific one. Travertine, low light, a hotel corridor at night. Sense of place is one of the highest-value “right-brain” features in the effectiveness research, and most UGC has none — it's shot against a bedroom wall. She already shoots somewhere that looks like money.
2. The lighting is objectively bad, and that is usable. Warm, dim, uneven. Terrible for a spec demo. But gold that still reads well in bad light is a genuine quality signal, and nobody in this category has thought to make that the test.
3. The styling wants the bracelet. Beige, cream, black boots, a lot of bare arm. The Bold Nocturne — chunky, gold, paperclip-linked — is the single best thing in your catalogue against that palette. The Charm Box Chain nearly disappears on it.

What carries over from the research, unchanged

- Character, place, dialogue, humour. Still the features that separate ads that work from ads that don't. The character is now her, played straight, rather than an archetype.
- Showmanship over salesmanship. On-screen text, hard CTAs and fact stacks lower emotional response 7–12%. So there are far fewer chips in these than in anything I've sent before — the specs are inside the lines.
- Written for sound on. ~80% of Reels are watched with audio. The visual still reads silently, but the line is the payoff and these are written to be heard.
- Built for the forward, not the comment. Each one lets the sender say something about themselves or a friend.
- Deadpan, never mean. Ragebait is going out of style and is a category-killer for a women's jewellery brand. The comedy here is all self-directed.

FIVE, WRITTEN OUT.

All 9:16, all shootable where she already is, all around two and a half words a second. Deadpan throughout — nothing here is performed, and nothing is shouted.

01 RECOMMENDED

THE BAD LIGHTING TEST

27S · THE LOCATION BECOMES THE PROOF · REUSABLE AS A FORMAT

0.0 [no voice] PICTURE The mirror selfie, exactly as she'd take it anyway. Phone up, travertine, low light. She lowers the phone and looks at herself properly.

1.2 "Every good photo I have ever taken was in a hotel bathroom." PICTURE Still in the mirror. Flat, like she's admitting something faintly embarrassing.

5.8 "Nobody knows why. The lighting in here is objectively terrible." PICTURE Tilt up to the downlight. It's harsh and yellow and doing her no favours.

9.4 "But this works in terrible lighting." PICTURE She lifts her wrist into the one good pool of light. Macro — the paperclip links, the pavé one catching. Hold it a full second longer than feels comfortable.

12.6 "Which is actually the only test that matters." PICTURE Back to her face in the mirror, half-lit.

16.4 "Not daylight. Not a shop. Here. At eleven at night." PICTURE Walking the corridor now. Boots. The slit. Gold moving against beige.

20.1 "Bold Nocturne. Nineteen ninety-nine, plus one-fifty delivered." PICTURE Wrist up against the travertine — warm stone, warm metal, and it still separates.

23.5 "Seven-day returns. Tap Shop Now." PICTURE Then 1.3s of end card over live footage of the wrist. Music resolves.

Why this one. It takes the single worst thing about where she shoots — the light — and turns it into the product's hardest test. That is a real quality signal dressed as a joke: plating that reads as gold under a bad hotel downlight is genuinely better than plating that only works in a lightbox. It is also the only script here that becomes a series. The Bad Lighting Test can run in a lift, a restaurant, an auto at night, a club bathroom — forever, on every SKU. A recurring format is the best-evidenced structural choice available and almost nobody uses one.

DOWNSTAIRS

26S · BATHOS — TOTAL OVERCOMMITMENT TO NOTHING

0.0 [no voice] PICTURE The full look, head to boots, in the mirror. She holds the pose. Then drops it.

1.0 “I am dressed like this...” PICTURE Beat. She checks herself once more. Genuinely pleased.

3.4 “...to go downstairs. To collect a parcel.” PICTURE Hard cut: the corridor, walking, absolutely committed.
Boots echoing.

7.6 “The outfit took four minutes.” PICTURE Quick pan down the skirt, the slit, the boots. Fast, throwaway.

10.2 “This took forty.” PICTURE Macro on the wrist. Slow. The pace change is the joke.

12.6 “Gold-plated over surgical steel. Lobster clasp, so it doesn’t go anywhere.” PICTURE
One-handed clasp click, in close-up, with the sound.

17.8 “Nineteen ninety-nine. One-fifty to deliver it. Seven days to send it back.” PICTURE At the lift. Doors open.

23.0 “The parcel can wait.” PICTURE Doors close on her. End card over the closed doors.

Why this one. Overdressing for nothing is the most universally recognised feeling in fashion content and almost nobody has written an ad around it. It flatters the product by implication — she would get dressed for no reason at all just to wear it — without a single claim being made. Highest forward potential of the five: every woman who has done this sends it to the friend she does it with.

03

I REMEMBER

24S · WITHHOLDING, THEN CAVING · FASHION GATEKEEPING

0.0 “Someone asked me where this is from.” PICTURE Straight in, no preamble. Mid-corridor, walking toward the mirror.

2.8 “I told her I couldn’t remember.” PICTURE She stops. Looks at the camera. Completely level.

5.6 [beat — hold it, let it get slightly too long] PICTURE Nothing moves. This pause is the whole joke; do not cut it short.

7.0 “I remember.” PICTURE Macro: the wrist, turning, gold against beige.

9.0 “I’m just not ready for all of you to have it.” PICTURE Walking again. Pleased with herself.

13.0 [beat] PICTURE She stops. Sighs. Gives in.

14.4 “...It’s nineteen ninety-nine. Bold Nocturne. Fine. Take it.” PICTURE Holds the wrist up to camera, a little defeated.

19.6 “Seven-day returns, cash on delivery, and I hope you’re happy.” PICTURE Walks out of frame. End card over the empty corridor.

Why this one. Gatekeeping a good find is real, specific, slightly shameful behaviour that everyone in fashion recognises. It turns the price reveal into a surrender rather than a pitch — which is the single most disarming way to say a number out loud. Shortest and cheapest of the five: two setups, one corridor.

THE ONES THAT DIDN'T MAKE IT

28S · ELIMINATION · THE PRODUCT WINS A CONTEST IT DIDN'T ENTER

0.0 "Four of these auditioned tonight." PICTURE Top-down: four or five pieces of her own jewellery laid in a row on the travertine ledge. The Nocturne is not among them yet.

2.8 "This one's too quiet." PICTURE A hand slides a thin chain out of frame. Deadpan, like a casting director.

5.4 "This one's trying too hard." PICTURE Second piece gone.

8.0 "This one turned my wrist a colour in April." PICTURE Third gone, with visible distaste. Only shoot this line if it is true of a piece she owns.

11.6 "And this one..." PICTURE Fourth. She pauses over it. Then slides it away too.

14.0 "...didn't audition. It was already on." PICTURE Pull back — the Nocturne has been on her wrist the entire time, in every shot. Let that land.

18.4 "It has been on since March." PICTURE Macro: links, clasp, the pavé catching the bad light.

21.4 "Gold-plated over surgical steel. Nineteen ninety-nine, one-fifty delivered." PICTURE Full look in the mirror, everything together.

26.0 "Seven-day returns. Tap Shop Now." PICTURE End card over live footage.

Why this one. The reveal — that it was on her wrist in every frame — is the strongest single structural idea of the five, and it rewards a rewatch, which is a ranking signal. It also does the durability job sideways: nothing is claimed, she simply never took it off. Only shoot "since March" and the April line if both are literally true.

NOT A DECISION

24S · THE GETTING-READY TRUTH · THE QUIETEST OF THE FIVE

0.0 “The skirt was a decision.” PICTURE Mirror. She looks down at it. The slit, the boots.

2.4 “The boots were a decision.” PICTURE Quick cut down. Chunky black against the stone floor.

4.8 “This was not a decision.” PICTURE She holds up the wrist. Barely looks at it. That’s the point — it’s automatic.

7.6 “This is just what I put on when I want the rest of it to make sense.” PICTURE Full look, mirror, the whole outfit reading as one thing.

13.0 “It goes with everything because it doesn’t try to be the outfit.” PICTURE Three fast cuts — the same bracelet, three different sleeves. Shoot these in ten minutes.

17.8 “Bold Nocturne. Nineteen ninety-nine, one-fifty delivered.” PICTURE Macro, clasp click with the sound.

21.4 “Seven days to change your mind.” PICTURE End card over live footage.

Why this one. Not funny — the opposite. This is the one that makes the bracelet feel like a wardrobe staple rather than a purchase, and it is the only script here that makes the versatility case, which is what actually drives a second order. Keep it as the retargeting cut. Run a funny one at cold traffic and this one at people who already clicked.

ONE HERO, ONE SERIES, ONE HEDGE.

THE RECOMMENDATION

Shoot 01 — The bad lighting test — as the hero, and shoot it as episode one of a series, not as a one-off. The premise survives being repeated: a lift, a restaurant at dinner, an auto at night, a club bathroom. Each episode is one location, one line and one macro, which means episodes two through ten cost almost nothing to make and get more effective as the format becomes recognisable.

Shoot 03 — I remember — the same afternoon. It's two setups in the corridor she's already standing in and it costs an extra twenty minutes. That gives you a funny cut and a proof cut from one shoot, which is the only way the arithmetic works at ₹3,000 a day.

Hold 05 — Not a decision — for retargeting. Warm audiences need reassurance, not a joke.

Why the location is worth protecting

Almost every competing ad in this category is shot against a bedroom wall or on a white sweep. She is shooting in a travertine hotel corridor at night. Do not lose that by moving to a tidy room with good light. The bad light is the asset, the stone is the asset, and the fact that she looks like she is going somewhere is the asset. Three notes:

- Find the one good pool of light before shooting anything — usually directly under a downlight or beside a mirror. Every macro of the bracelet goes there. Everything else can stay moody.
- Lock exposure on the wrist, not the corridor. Tap and hold. If the phone meters for the dark walls it will blow the gold out completely.
- Clean the bracelet before every take. At macro, under a hard downlight, a fingerprint is the whole shot.

What to shoot in the same afternoon regardless of the pick

SHOT	WHY IT'S NEEDED
01 The mirror selfie, as she'd take it anyway	Opens three of the five scripts. Costs nothing.
02 Wrist in the one good pool of light, macro, slow turn	The money shot for every script.
03 Lobster clasp closing, macro, with live sound	Nameable hardware, and the best foley you'll get.
04 Walking the corridor — boots, slit, gold moving	Motion, place, and the only shot that says "going somewhere".
05 Wrist against the travertine itself	Warm stone against warm metal — if it still separates, that's the proof.
06 Same bracelet, three different sleeves	The versatility beat. Ten minutes.
07 The lift, doors opening and closing	Ends script 02, and it's a free location.
08 Jewellery laid in a row on the ledge, top-down	Opens script 04.

Still true, whichever you shoot

NON-NEGOTIABLE

Never “waterproof” · never “18K gold” — it is 18K gold-plated over surgical steel · no wear-log claim she can’t support · any spoken price carries the ₹150 delivery · #Ad in the top third from the first frame, held a third of the runtime · no named competitor · no false urgency.

Music: every currently-trending Indian audio is unusable in a paid ad — Instagram listing a sound does not mean Meta licensed it, and business accounts can’t reach the full library anyway. Meta Sound Collection, Epidemic or Artlist. Decide before the shoot. For these five, something sparse and low would suit the corridor better than anything busy.

One thing I’d still like to be wrong about

Script 04 leans on “it has been on since March” and on a piece of her own jewellery that discoloured in April. Both are excellent lines and both are only usable if they are literally true. If they aren’t, tell me and I’ll rewrite that script without them — the elimination structure still works, it just loses its best two beats.

Tell me which

Pick a number and I’ll build the full package: beat sheet at frame accuracy, shot list, the one-page read sheet for Sejal, the timed caption file, and the compliance pass. If the register is right but none of the five quite lands, say which is closest and what’s off — that’s a much faster correction than starting again.
